

Where do you start with finding enterprise resource traceability software?

Undoubtedly traceability is a big issue across the supply chain, so where do you start when looking at a manufacturing system to control traceability?

The best way to deliver a solid, consistent, repeatable performance in response to the traceability challenge is by investing in a system that provides instant access to all the right information. It must support you in quickly answering the following questions for every component, part and materials in your factory:

Can it help you identify parts and material with a unique batch number?

Can it help you identify each part or unit of material with an individual serial number?

Can it help you track a batch of material from receipt to despatch?

Can it help you find out where a batch of material is now?

Can it help you find out all product affected by a bad batch of material?

Can it help you trace all components of a failing part back to their origin?

Can it help you identify the supplier of all bought in materials?

Can it help you identify the supplier's batch or cast number for all bought in materials?

Can it help you access all documentation relevant to a particular batch of material, for example POs, invoices and certificates of conformity?

Can it help you quarantine a batch of material?

Can it help you see all transactions relating to a batch of material?

Can it help you easily identify every employee who worked on a manufactured product?

Can it help you identify any quality issues relating to a batch of manufactured parts?
